

(DRAFT 1)
30 AGO. 2025

I RECENTLY GOT A TYPEWRITER IN AN ATTEMPT TO REGAIN MY FOCUS

by:

Andrea Esposito

To be published in:
Research in Ink (blog)

I RECENTLY GOT A TYPEWRITER IN AN ATTEMPT TO REGAIN MY FOCUS

My mind and general interests are currently in a very hard spot. I am a researcher working in the field of computer science. This brings me to face technology everyday. And I do that with immense pleasure: I love keeping updated on the latest tech news and gadgets. I usually follow, every year, at least Apple's WWDC in an attempt to understand where the software is moving to. And I am genuinely excited about any new announcement they do. As an example, working in the field of Human-Computer Interaction, I was genuinely excited ^{this year} when Apple introduced the "Dynamic Island" because, in a way, it was blurring the line between hardware and software.

Every new gadget, tool, app, software, and what-not sparks my curiosity. I must try them all.

However this sort of "maximalism" when it comes to the tools I use everyday for my work is not something that is actually useful, but rather almost harmful.

I usually struggle with an astonishingly easy-to-distract brain. Therefore, the sheer amount of tools is a perfectly fertile ground to get my mind out of the zone and start trying new stuff out. Some days I happen to not be able to do any actual work at all, but rather spend the entire time trying out new stuff, or customizing (which I justify as "improving") already-known tools.

Obviously, this is a serious hazard for my productivity on its own, but the effect are amplified by the usual ~~distractions~~^{data}: messages, e-mails, MS Teams calls, calendar invites, social media... ~~A~~ A nightmare full of inputs for my already lazy and easily distracted brain...

Now, being a researcher means that a great deal of my time is spent on writing stuff. Whether it is a report, a paper, some documentation, bureaucratic forms, or whatever else, one way or the other I am writing. So, I needed a way to improve my focus and get myself in flow for writing.

an old Olivetti studio 45 i

Here enters my granddad. During a routine clean up of his garage he found an old typewriter that he had. Before he threw ~~hi~~ it away, I got an idea: why not try use it to reach my goal of distraction-free in-the-zone writing? I wouldn't be the first one using a typewriter in 2025 for the purpose of typing drafts of text: a quick search on YouTube or Google surfaces enough results to help me not feeling stupid for even having had this idea.

maybe a photo of the typewriter?

Did it work? I currently have no idea. In theory, it should: using a typewriter lets you have absolutely no form of distraction (unless someone comes tapping on your shoulder) and having a material piece of paper with writing on it is a plus since it makes reviewing your text a far more pleasurable experience (at least for me, since I prefer reading on paper). However, I have not had this typewriter for enough time to understand whether it has improved my workflow.

One thing is certain though: an initial draft of this post was written on ~~it~~ my typewriter and I had words flowing out of me like they never did. So, I'm faithful, and I'll post an update with the results of my very non-scientific test.

Until later!

Maybe a scan of the draft?

Andrea